22. LUCK OR PERSISTENCE?

When she was 11 years old, Kim Merritt sampled chocolate at a candy store and thought she could do better. She made her own recipes and began selling small candy bars in her home town of Cumberland, Maryland. The effort was much like that of man youngsters who open lemonade stand to earn a few dollars to spend at the movies; however, people began asking her for more. Using meager profits and her mother's kitchen, Kim began making large batches of candy, then designed her own wrappers and developed a commission system for friends who sold chocolates at several schools.

Business was so good that it became an obsession. Kim worked after school, weekends and holidays and aside from a brief period when the health department suspended her operations until she could obtain proper permits to cook candy, she made candy by hand until she graduated from high school. At first, she could meet demand without special equipment or sacrificing other activities, but when she provided candy for a school fund-raising event, demand exceeded capacity, and Kim found herself buying professional equipment, hiring helpers, and purchasing bulk supplies.

Looking back, Kim recalls the obsession, the long hours, and the challenge to learn about business. Always on the initiative, Kim set about placing orders with local stores and developing contracts with dozens of schools and civic organizations. Her business, Kim's Khocolates, soon occupied her entire family and closest friends, and she registered the company and set up a chocolate boutique. During her first month, she had 18,000 orders, and before graduating from high school, Kim was distributing specialty chocolates to retail stores in three states.

In 1989, at age 21, Kim repositioned her company as a major distributor of specialty candies and began planning a chain of upscale chocolate shops for the 1990s. The chain would complement her candy manufacturing and distribution system, but it would also mean major changes in her organization. She paused to think about her plans, realizing that to launch a regional or national chain would mean a corporate endeavor. She and her family could not handle all the responsibilities, and the nature of Kim's Khocolates would change. This was not a pleasant thought, although the idea of pursuing a major business was exciting.

Reflecting on her business, Kim realized that she had fun and made a great deal of money, but many people considered her success no more than the luck of a personable young lady who made good candies and accidentally stumbled into a few good markets. On the other hand, Kim knew that she had worked extremely hard to attract clients. Most of her customers had not been comfortable buying from a young high school student, and she was seldom taken seriously by customers until they had dealt with her for a long time. Winning over her customers had always been a challenge to Kim, not a roadblock, and creating unusual candies have been a joy, not a job.

Thinking about her plans, she was not anxious to become a corporate manager, and although she had always worked well with others, Kim liked the feeling of independence. Running a company would mean sacrificing her autonomy, yet the idea of chain of store selling her specialty candies had
